"This volume brings together a few poems that many of us have loved, especially while growing up. Some are memories of growing up in Liverpool during the Second World War. I remember mother gathering all of us brothers and sisters together and hurrying us to the shelter, or to the basement of the local church, when the sirens went off. Mother would keep us all cheerful by telling us poems and stories. Because of the war, along with food and all the other shortages, teachers were scarce. We learnt by rote but they also taught us poetry we loved to recite. When my father Henry Whewell came out of the army we all used to gather around the fire in the winter and he would tell us ghost stories and tales about lions and tigers and other wild animals that lived in the jungle. 'The Tiger' by William Blake reminds me of them. Mother used to say, 'Don't frighten the children before they go to bed'. I am sure that the poems collected here will bring back memories for many, or be the means of enchanting new readers who might read them for the first time."-Josephine Juden.
